Oyo makes room for revival

SURAJEET DAS GUPTA
New Delhi, 10 August

Chastened by unhappy partners and the pandemic-induced downturn, the hotel aggregator has revamped its strategy for sustainable growth

SoftBank's Masayoshi Son, one of the chief financial backers of Oyo Hotels and Rooms, called it the jewel of his fund. His expectation from the budget hotel chain start-up, in which SoftBank has a 46 per cent stake, founded by Ritesh Agarwal was simple: Become the largest hotel chain network in the world in terms of rooms.

Initially, Oyo justified Son's faith. In 2019, Agarwal with 1.2 million hotel rooms across the world was just behind Marriott in the pecking order (1.4 million) and bigger than Hilton (1.01 million). Since then, however, the hotel aggregator has struggled with heavy losses from poor decisions, Covid-19 and a huge write-down of its China business. A $1.2-billion initial public offering planned sometime next year could test the mettle of the revival strategy that has involved essentially learning from its mistakes.

Oyo's principal problem was reckless growth. From the time it was set up in 2013, it spent heavily on incentives such as a minimum guarantee scheme to woo hoteliers and invested in hotels' capex and management. When the pandemic hit, Oyo's hotel empire shrank, as hotel owners left in large numbers. Its rank amongst top global hotel chains (in terms of rooms) fell precipitously from number two in 2019 to number nine in 2021, according to Hospitality-on.com. And the number of rooms halved (0.53 million).

In March 2019, the last year it disclosed financials, the company announced losses of $335 million, a six-fold increase, 60 per cent of it on account of the hit from China, forcing it to retrench a sizeable portion of its 30,000-strong global workforce. There were reports that SoftBank had cut the valuation of the company sharply.

That was when Agarwal and his team decided to revisit its strategy, talking to hundreds of hotel partners and listening to their tough conversations. The upshot was a major revamp of its business model to make it cost-light and partner-friendly.

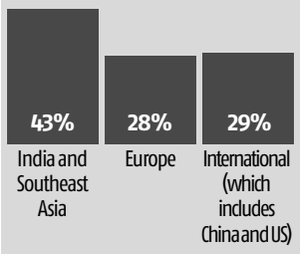

First, it replaced the minimum guarantee assurance, a major source of friction with owners, with the more workable revenue-share model in which Oyo receives 30 per cent of the room tariff.

Second, it took on board hotel owners' complaints that Oyo's practice of fixing low tariffs squeezed their margins. Now, it would offer an indicative price, giving owners a 20 to 40 per cent flexibility to charge above or below it. In that spirit, it is planning to reduce payment reconciliation time with partners — another area of friction — from twice a week to every day.

Third, it put a stop to the practice of investing in and managing hotels, reducing the cash burn (25 per cent of its Indian hotels were of this nature).

Fourth, it has also shifted its positioning from being an online budget hotel chain to a technology platform and consultancy to help partners run their hotels efficiently, control inventory, get the best price and save costs. An Oyo Partner Academy will provide help in identifying locations for more hotels, in formalising lease agreements and in handling large numbers of hotels through technology.

OYO'S REVENUE CONTRIBUTION BY MARKET

Rohit Kapoor, CEO of Oyo's business in India and Southeast Asia, said that the changes are working: "In terms of rooms, we are reaching pretty close to pre-pandemic levels. Our strategy is to bring back all those who went out. And there is huge scope for growth with the capex-light new model."

Evidence of initial success is that the India operations reported positive earnings before interest, depreciation, tax and amortisation in the first quarter of 2021, when many hotels opened up. Other analysts say gross India margins, which were as low as 4 per cent, hit around 25 per cent in the quarter as a result of the new strategy.

This strategy is being backed by geographic realignments. As Kapoor explained, "Our capital allocation will be focused on India, Southeast Asia and Europe where we have a reasonable market share and gross margins and a clear upside. In markets like the US and China, we will continue to build the partner franchises. But if you are asking whether we will double down on these markets, the answer is no."

That, analysts say, signals a focus away from China where Oyo, Agarwal had declared in 2019, had become the largest single-brand hotel chain in the market with 500,000 rooms within a year in 337 cities. Yet, in 2020, hotel owners descended on the Shanghai office alleging that the company must pay them for lost business. A report by China Hospitality Association said in 2020 Oyo was still the largest foreign hotel brand but its numbers had dwindled to only 114,185 rooms (three Chinese hotel brands were far bigger).

But Oyo is tweaking its play for better margins. Abhinav Sinha, chief product officer, Oyo, said: "We are focusing on premium brands — so 40-45 per cent of incremental hotel additions will be in TownHouse Oak and Bella Vista." The target is to have a chain with almost half the hotels in the mid-market and premium category in two years.

Though the asset- and capex-light model, which is at the heart of the strategy, is yet to be tested, there is an upside to the business. The addressable market for budget hotels across the globe is huge, estimated at 200 million rooms, and Oyo has scratched the surface with only 190,000 partners across the globe. This potential appears to have investors interested. Talks are on with Microsoft for raising a fresh round of funds, which could push up its valuation back to $9-10 billion from $3-4 billion, at which some analysts had pegged it. The company has also raised $660 million in debt recently to refinance its loans, including from Boston-based Fidelity. According to Kapoor, the company has $600-700 million of cash in the bank and is in no hurry for more funds. With the Covid-19 pandemic yet to run its course, that can certainly be considered a confident prediction.

Can Moderna buy its way into the $200 billion club?

Moderna's highly effective Covid vaccine, in addition to protecting millions, is officially a cash cow. The firm disclosed during its earnings presentation on August 5 that it expects the shot to generate $20 billion in sales this year. Now it has to figure out what to do with its windfall as it tries to justify a market valuation that has surged by more than $100 billion since May. That's a nice problem to have. But it's also an urgent strategic issue.

The Cambridge, Massachusetts-based biotechnology firm's astonishing stock surge has been driven by the success of its vaccine and excitement about its underlying messenger RNA technology, which it is also employing in other shots and treatments in early stages of development. As of now, though, the Covid jab is the company's only approved product, and its finite future sales depend on the very uncertain trajectory of the pandemic and booster shots.

Single-product companies are usually targets rather than buyers when it comes to biotech. But Moderna is in the rare position of having the firepower to go on the hunt itself. M&A makes sense; it's certainly a better alternative to buying back $1 billion worth of its inflated shares, which the company also plans to do. But don't expect acquisitions to solidify a valuation that has somehow surpassed that of McDonald's and Morgan Stanley.

Moderna has plenty of deal capacity, with $12.2 billion cash in hand and more coming in, as well as highly valuable stock and minimal debt. But it plans to be very particular about what it buys.

On its August 5 earnings call, Moderna CEO Stephane Bancel said it would only invest in new areas that are complementary to mRNA, which the body uses to give cells instructions. Bancel specifically said the company is interested in gene editing and gene therapy and that it won't invest in small-molecule or antibody drugs. This focus on newer technology rules out many targets and means investors shouldn't expect deals to diminish its risky Covid sales cliff, which will arrive well before its internal drug pipeline is ready to contribute.

Moderna's strategy could pay off if investors are patient, and the company seems to have lots of believers in its long-term future. But their conviction and Moderna's valuation haven't really been tested yet. If the Covid booster market peters out sooner than expected or Moderna has a significant pipeline hiccup, look out below.

Rural consumers' brand adoption

AMBI PARAMESWARAN

"Our cement division is having a great quarter," said my friend who works in a large group with interests across multiple sectors. I was surprised. This was a conversation happening in July 2020. Major cities were still in some form of lockdown. Construction activities were down to the bare minimum. From my office I could see the huge residential project coming up next door had stopped adding floors at the alarming speed they were working at till March 2020. If big projects in cities like Mumbai and Delhi had ground to a halt, who was buying all this cement? My friend explained that rural and semi-urban demand for cement had jumped and his explanation was that the huge reverse migration into rural India had given construction a big fillip.

I was not fully convinced but I did admit that numbers don't lie.

It was, therefore, interesting to read an article from Journal of Marketing [JM.18.0592.R4] by Vishal Narayan of National University of Singapore and Shreya Kankanhalli of Stanford ("The Economic and Social Impacts of Migration on Brand Expenditure: Evidence from Rural India"). In the article the authors studied the effect of the massive reverse migration of labour from urban centres to rural India on adoption of brands or what is called "brandification". While they did not study the consumption of cement, they did study the impact on consumption of packaged branded consumer products. In addition to studying the adoption process of rural households, they also studied the impact of other influences like size of village, availability of mobile phones and television. Their findings showed some interesting trends.

The question remains whether rural households that experimented with a packaged branded atta or packaged branded detergent will continue to use the same. That may depend on the economic situation and availability

First, let us dig into what we mean by "brandification". India is reported to be one of the least "brandified" markets in the world. Almost 60 per cent of all that a household consumes is unbranded or could be called commodities. This could include daily use products like milk and atta as well as other regular consumption products like biscuits and washing soaps. What drives brandification? It is normally understood that brandification is directly related to consumer education, availability of branded goods, affordability and, most importantly, monthly household income. As GDP and per capita GDP improves, it is normally understood that brands will benefit.

The authors in their article point towards two key influences migration has on consumption of branded products. The first is what they call the "Economic Remittance"; this is easy to explain. The migrant labour transfer economic prosperity to their homes in the village. The second transfer is what they call "Social Remittance". The migrant labour, when they move back to the village, take with them the social knowledge of brands and how they save time and effort. For instance, a migrant labour working in Mumbai may tell his family in rural Uttar Pradesh how packaged branded atta used to save him a lot of time and effort as he had to cook his daily rotis. He may also explain that rotis made from packaged atta are tasty and are safe from bacteria or viruses. You may say that this is nothing new and may have been happening for decades. It is also true that most migrant labour tend to go back to their village every year for the big festival; Diwali in the north, Pongal in Tamil Nadu and so forth. But during the year 2020, it is reported that almost 120 million daily wage earners went back to their villages. This is an amazing number of potential social remittances.

The research said that the return of migrant labour, possibly in such large numbers, led to a sudden demand spurt for packaged branded goods in rural India. The researchers say that the effect was muted in households living in larger villages (which may have had a robust word-of-mouth and retail system), that had television and were used to mobile telephony. Understandably, households with long-standing migration tradition did not see a rapid adoption of new brands last year.

If you relate back these findings with the financial results declared by many of the branded packaged goods marketers for Q2/Q3 of FY 2020-21, you will realise that they did benefit from the demand upsurge from rural India.

The question remains whether rural households that experimented with a packaged branded atta or packaged branded detergent will continue to use the same. That may depend on the economic situation and availability. Even educated urban Indian consumers tend to switch from branded to unbranded goods with great fluency. In the past cooking oil brands used to see their sales rise or fall depending on the price of unbranded (commodity) oil.

This brings us back to our cement question. I feel in addition to Economic Remittance and Social Remittance, labour going back to villages are also doing a "Skill Remittance". A construction worker going back to his village not only takes some money with him and the knowledge of brands but also the valuable skill on how to build a wall or a room. Returning migrant workers from the Gulf who had worked in the construction sector have traditionally carried their skills back to Kerala and leveraged it wherever possible. This triple benefit transfer, in such large numbers, may have indeed helped the cement players last year. My friend was probably right in more ways than one.

The Cambridge, Massachusetts-based biotechnology firm's astonishing stock surge has been driven by the success of its vaccine and excitement about its underlying messenger RNA technology, which it is also employing in other shots and treatments in early stages of development. As of now, though, the Covid jab is the company's only approved product, and its finite future sales depend on the very uncertain trajectory of the pandemic and booster shots.

Single-product companies are usually targets rather than buyers when it comes to biotech. But Moderna is in the rare position of having the firepower to go on the hunt itself. M&A makes sense; it's certainly a better alternative to buying back $1 billion worth of its inflated shares, which the company also plans to do. But don't expect acquisitions to solidify a valuation that has somehow surpassed that of McDonald's and Morgan Stanley.

Moderna has plenty of deal capacity, with $12.2 billion cash in hand and more coming in, as well as highly valuable stock and minimal debt. But it plans to be very particular about what it buys.

On its August 5 earnings call, Moderna CEO Stephane Bancel said it would only invest in new areas that are complementary to mRNA, which the body uses to give cells instructions. Bancel specifically said the company is interested in gene editing and gene therapy and that it won't invest in small-molecule or antibody drugs. This focus on newer technology rules out many targets and means investors shouldn't expect deals to diminish its risky Covid sales cliff, which will arrive well before its internal drug pipeline is ready to contribute.

Moderna's strategy could pay off if investors are patient, and the company seems to have lots of believers in its long-term future. But their conviction and Moderna's valuation haven't really been tested yet. If the Covid booster market peters out sooner than expected or Moderna has a significant pipeline hiccup, look out below.

Rural consumers' brand adoption

AMBI PARAMESWARAN

"Our cement division is having a great quarter," said my friend who works in a large group with interests across multiple sectors. I was surprised. This was a conversation happening in July 2020. Major cities were still in some form of lockdown. Construction activities were down to the bare minimum. From my office I could see the huge residential project coming up next door had stopped adding floors at the alarming speed they were working at till March 2020. If big projects in cities like Mumbai and Delhi had ground to a halt, who was buying all this cement? My friend explained that rural and semi-urban demand for cement had jumped and his explanation was that the huge reverse migration into rural India had given construction a big fillip.

I was not fully convinced but I did admit that numbers don't lie.

It was, therefore, interesting to read an article from Journal of Marketing [JM.18.0592.R4] by Vishal Narayan of National University of Singapore and Shreya Kankanhalli of Stanford ("The Economic and Social Impacts of Migration on Brand Expenditure: Evidence from Rural India"). In the article the authors studied the effect of the massive reverse migration of labour from urban centres to rural India on adoption of brands or what is called "brandification". While they did not study the consumption of cement, they did study the impact on consumption of packaged branded consumer products. In addition to studying the adoption process of rural households, they also studied the impact of other influences like size of village, availability of mobile phones and television. Their findings showed some interesting trends.

The question remains whether rural households that experimented with a packaged branded atta or packaged branded detergent will continue to use the same. That may depend on the economic situation and availability

First, let us dig into what we mean by "brandification". India is reported to be one of the least "brandified" markets in the world. Almost 60 per cent of all that a household consumes is unbranded or could be called commodities. This could include daily use products like milk and atta as well as other regular consumption products like biscuits and washing soaps. What drives brandification? It is normally understood that brandification is directly related to consumer education, availability of branded goods, affordability and, most importantly, monthly household income. As GDP and per capita GDP improves, it is normally understood that brands will benefit.

The authors in their article point towards two key influences migration has on consumption of branded products. The first is what they call the "Economic Remittance"; this is easy to explain. The migrant labour transfer economic prosperity to their homes in the village. The second transfer is what they call "Social Remittance". The migrant labour, when they move back to the village, take with them the social knowledge of brands and how they save time and effort. For instance, a migrant labour working in Mumbai may tell his family in rural Uttar Pradesh how packaged branded atta used to save him a lot of time and effort as he had to cook his daily rotis. He may also explain that rotis made from packaged atta are tasty and are safe from bacteria or viruses. You may say that this is nothing new and may have been happening for decades. It is also true that most migrant labour tend to go back to their village every year for the big festival; Diwali in the north, Pongal in Tamil Nadu and so forth. But during the year 2020, it is reported that almost 120 million daily wage earners went back to their villages. This is an amazing number of potential social remittances.

The research said that the return of migrant labour, possibly in such large numbers, led to a sudden demand spurt for packaged branded goods in rural India. The researchers say that the effect was muted in households living in larger villages (which may have had a robust word-of-mouth and retail system), that had television and were used to mobile telephony. Understandably, households with long-standing migration tradition did not see a rapid adoption of new brands last year.

If you relate back these findings with the financial results declared by many of the branded packaged goods marketers for Q2/Q3 of FY 2020-21, you will realise that they did benefit from the demand upsurge from rural India.

The question remains whether rural households that experimented with a packaged branded atta or packaged branded detergent will continue to use the same. That may depend on the economic situation and availability. Even educated urban Indian consumers tend to switch from branded to unbranded goods with great fluency. In the past cooking oil brands used to see their sales rise or fall depending on the price of unbranded (commodity) oil.

This brings us back to our cement question. I feel in addition to Economic Remittance and Social Remittance, labour going back to villages are also doing a "Skill Remittance". A construction worker going back to his village not only takes some money with him and the knowledge of brands but also the valuable skill on how to build a wall or a room. Returning migrant workers from the Gulf who had worked in the construction sector have traditionally carried their skills back to Kerala and leveraged it wherever possible. This triple benefit transfer, in such large numbers, may have indeed helped the cement players last year. My friend was probably right in more ways than one.
